

Building an Effective Website

It's all about the message

Why do people visit?

---

- They are looking for something, that is, to find out who you are.
- Because you have a product they want.

Why people visit a website comes down to 2 basic needs: (1) They are looking for something. People might look for a church if they are frustrated with the church they currently attend, or have been “driven out” for one reason or another. Or they might be new to your area, or new to the faith, and are now looking to see which church might be a good fit for them. Or (2), because you have a product they want. In the case of a church, that might be something you’ve written or recorded that inspires them.

People are unlikely to just “stumble upon” your website. It’s not likely your website will ever break into the top 20 pages for “who is Jesus”. When it comes down to it, a local church website is highly unlikely to attract people who aren’t already “church people”. That is, your audience is either looking for a church, or looking for resources.

Satisfying their needs

- By telling people who you are.
- By providing resources that help them in their Christian walk.

What you provide on your website really comes down to how much time and commitment you or your volunteer(s) are willing to put into it. If you have low commitment, then you want to focus on telling people who you are, because that will be your largest audience. If you have more commitment, you can provide resources like articles, sermons, devotionals, or other resources that help people in their relationship and life with Jesus.

Where they come from

- People who already know about your church and search for it by name.
- People searching for a church in your city or region.

Being effective means...

- Clearly convey who you are
- Answer questions people might have about you
- Help people understand whether they will fit in

Before you start...

- You must identify a relevant and compelling message to communicate to your audience. Without a message there is no need to create a website.

Before you start...

- Before you can identify your message, you must know who you are at your very core and what you are good at.

I've visited three churches besides my regular church in the last year. All of them claim on their websites to be "friendly". Yet at all three, the only person who greeted me was the greeter at the door. And the only people who talked to me were the ones I went up to and introduced myself to. Not being an extrovert, this made me very uncomfortable and I felt ignored. Were I looking for a church, none of the ones I visited would get a second visit, because I simply didn't belong. And that's why the message has to be real. Saying your church is friendly doesn't make it friendly. So your identity as a church has to be "owned" by the majority in it.

It's a big question. You shouldn't take it lightly. You and your church leaders should spend some time praying, thinking and figuring it out. Because that's THE question people want to know.

Do you mind if I pick on some of our better church websites? Let's look at some examples... bad and good.

So who are you?

---

- We are a Christian church.
- We worship Jesus and acknowledge him as our head.

So does the church across the street. Do we need to say this? Absolutely. It's something people will want to know. But it is only who you are in a very general sense. It's not specific enough to warrant my interest in your church.

So who are you?

---

- Trinitarian theology.

Yawn! Is it important? Absolutely. And it might actually attract some intellectual types who think that your sermons might be studies in Trinitarian theology. But at the core, it says “God is the center of everything we are and do.” And most churches would think they believe that too. And most Christians wouldn’t see what makes you any different than the mega-church down the street.

So who are you?

---

- We are a Christ-centered fellowship worshipping our loving God, who is Father, Son and Holy Spirit...

The page goes on and on quoting almost verbatim the denomination's goals, mission, and ministries page. Lots of words, but very generalized and it really still tells me nothing about your church that sets it apart.

So who are you?

---

- The real question is what makes you different than every other church. Why would I want to visit or be a part of what you're doing? Are you really doing anything?

So who are you?

---

- We want to:
  - Help more people enjoy new life through faith in Jesus Christ,
  - Help more people accept this new life Jesus offers,

Example: www.newlife3.org

So who are you?

---

- Help each other enjoy the life He gives us,
- Help each other through our pains and difficulties, and
- Encourage each other as we live for Christ.

Example: www.newlife3.org

So who are you?

---

- Connecting this world to the "Living Hope"... Jesus Christ

Example: www.reliance-cc.org

So who are you?

---

- It's all about Relationship.
  - Pursuing an intimate relationship with Jesus Christ.
  - Deepening our Relationship with each other.
  - Reaching out to those in need.

Example: www.reliance-cc.org

Why the fuss about identity?

---

- Because people want to identify with:
  - Your organizational DNA and core values
  - Your mission and vision
  - Your beliefs

Why the fuss about identity?

- Because people will evaluate whether you are what you say you are.

I've spend a lot of time on "who we are" because it's the most important message of an effective website. Who you are must be genuine because when people visit your church, they will see who you really are. And who you are must be attractive because people won't visit your church unless they can identify with who you are and your focus as a church. We can't compete in the number of ministries with a mega-church. Most of the time, we can't even compete on quality of the few ministries we have. Generally, we can't even compete with their music or preaching. Where we can compete is with our purpose and sense of belonging.

Take children's ministry—if you have 50 people with 7 kids, you just can't provide the same opportunities in children's ministry as a church of 1000 with 200 kids. It's just reality. But if I like your message, and I come visit anyway and my little boy (if I had one) hit it off and was instant best friends with Bob's little boy, and everyone seems so friendly, introduces themselves, and seems to really care about me and my family, the chances are much better than I'll stick around. But your message about who you are needs to be real.

So at my home church, "it all about relationship". So extrovert or not (and I'm not), I make it a point to talk to people I know and people I don't know every week. I try very hard to remember the names of new people and other things I've learned about them so it really is about relationship. It's harder for me than a lot of our extroverts, but I'm part of the church and I own the identity as much as they do.

The Basic Process

- Figure out who you are and what your focus is as a church
- Develop that into a story
- Write the text with search in mind

- Start with your mission statement.
- Short. 1 sentence or phrase.
- Easy to remember

This starts with you as the pastor, but also needs to include your church leadership. And when I say “leadership”, you may want to include your “faithful servants” in that group at least for this purpose. They’ll feel valued and appreciate being able to give feedback in the process. Plus, they really need to own the identity that comes out the process.

You need to be able to quote your mission readily without looking it up to anyone who’s interested. This is something that needs to be common knowledge. It needs to be looked at regularly and thought about. Are you really living up to your mission?

- Your organizational DNA
  - What is it all about?
  - How are you getting it done?
  - Short, easy-to remember main points.

- What is your vision for your church?
- Ideally, how does it live out its mission and DNA?

- Purpose
- Core values
- Plan
- Work Goals

Developing your story

- The story you create needs to be compelling. It should generate interest in your church.
- It should be consistent.
- It needs to be authentic.

Writing the content

---

- Your home page is your most important page for attracting new people.

---

- Your home page needs to tell a clear story about your church.
- It doesn't need to tell ALL about your church

Writing the content

---

- The story on your home page needs to take into account how people will find your website.

Key home page info

- Your church name
- What kind of church you are—"Christian church", "community church"
- Your location

Home Page Example

- We are a community of real people attempting to come alongside one another in this faith journey as we seek to know God in a deeper way and participate with what Jesus is doing in this world through the Spirit who lives in us.

Example: www.cornerstonecommunityonline.net

Good? No. What's it missing? Type of church and location. Why is that important? Because while the church name and city are at the very top, it's not enough to get this church on page 1. It's on page 3 for "Christian church in Lemon Grove, CA" and 80% of people will probably never see it.

Making it better...

- Add a sentence to the top:
- Cornerstone Community Church is a Christian church in Lemon Grove, California serving the eastern San Diego area.

- Hope Community Fellowship is a Spirit-led body that welcomes new members. We are exhorted to, "Grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 3:18). Jesus promised that the Holy Spirit would lead his followers into all truth (John 6:13). Join us in this journey into grace, knowledge, and truth.

What's missing? "Church". People don't search for "fellowship"—they search for "church". It's missing the common search terms and the location and people just simply won't ever find your church website in a search.

Making it better...

- Hope Community Fellowship is a Christian church in The Colony, Texas serving the northern Dallas area. We are a Spirit-led community that welcomes new members...

- Welcome to Christian Family Fellowship, a Christian community church located in Jacksonville, Florida. CFF is a diverse group of individuals, united in Christ.

So this one uses the right words and goes on to tell a pretty decent story. I'd love to say the site is successful, but it doesn't show up in searches like it should. There are other factors that affect search engines. In this case, I know the site is indexed because searching for the church name brings it up. BUT, it appears Google has penalized it for some reason—perhaps it thinks it is “keyword stuffing” to try to get more exposure than it deserves. It's hard to tell for sure without spending some time in Google webmaster tools.

Home Page Content

- A clear link for new people
- Where and when you meet

When you make an effective website that makes a clear statement about who you and what your focus is, you expect the website to be a place where people first come in contact with your church. Besides wanting to know who you and your focus, they will want to know what to expect from your services. This is what you give them under that link for new people.

Where and when you meet is very important because some people will want to visit your church. At our church we found that displaying that on the home page and having links to it other places wasn't enough. Our pastor was still getting comments from people that they couldn't figure out where we met from our website. Eventually, we made it a block that appears on virtually every page so no matter where you are on the website, you can see where and when we meet and click a link to get a map and directions.

Other content

- Welcome from the pastor
- About the pastor/staff
- Getting connected
- A way to contact you

We don't have a welcome from the pastor on our website. A good welcome message shares the pastor's passion and invites people to experience for themselves what makes your church different.

Some people will want to know what qualifies your pastor and/or staff for what they do. Sharing a short bio and picture of the pastor and key staff helps people connect with them so they feel less out-of-place when they visit.

There are "Sunday" church people who just want to come worship with you one day a week when it's convenient for them. And there are those who want to be more involved in the church community. Those people will want to know what opportunities your church offers to connect with others besides just sitting in the main worship service. In this section, it's good to share your ministries, service opportunities, small groups or Bible studies and other regular activities you have. I realize this varies greatly from church to church and if you really don't have much else going on, then leave the section out.

New people will sometimes want to talk to a real person before they visit the church. At the very least you should have a contact form or an email address listed. You may also want to list a phone number. Will you get spam and sales calls? Very likely. But you will also get real people with real needs—people who may be interested in your church who may never come if they can't contact you to start with. So what do you do? Well, you can easily create a new email address for the church at a free email provider, or even using your own domain name if you have one. That way the spam and sales stuff isn't clogging up your personal email. But if you do that, someone needs to check it at least daily.

What about phone? Our church uses Google Voice. If you use Gmail for that free email account, you can use the same account to set up a Google Voice phone number, record a nice greeting message and people can leave messages for the church there. It will email you when there's a voice message. You can ignore the sales calls and return the calls from real people, perhaps even giving them a real phone number to call if you have to leave them a message.

- Coming events
- Event calendar
- Weekly bulletin/program

While these types of things can help website visitors get a sense of “there’s more going on here than just church”, it’s a commitment. If you’re going to post ANY event announcements, please keep it updated. Nothing says “stale” like the announcement about your “coming anniversary celebration” that happened in 2010.

Other content

- Audio/video sermons
- Articles
- Devotionals

These again take commitment. Our church does weekly audio, and most of the time I get it posted within a week of the service. These types of content are really for people who are already connected to your church or pastor, so if they aren't updated regularly, they just get stale and no one reads, listens or watches them. If kept updated, they can be valuable resources for shut-ins, people who are connected to your pastor that aren't in the local area, members who miss a service or just really want to hear that message again. But don't do it if you can't keep up with it.

Effectiveness recap - musts

---

- Clearly convey who you are
- Answer questions people might have about you
- Help people understand whether they will fit in

Effectiveness recap - might

- Give details on current events
- Provide resources to help people in their Christian walk
- Help people connect to your church community
